HISTORICAL BARBER; HE DATES POLE BACK IN 1461

"Next!—Hair cut?"

"Yes, cut a little off all of them," said the patron as he climbed into the barber's chair.

The barber picked up the hair protector and adjusted it over the patron's chest as gently as a mother puts a bib on her baby.

"Feather edge or full back?" inquired the barber as he pulled the comb through the thick hair with his left hand and worked the clippers in the air with the right.

"Better make it 'feather edge,' I guess, 'cause it's getting warm now."

With these introductions the nimble fingered barber began to remove a four weeks' growth of hair which rolled down over the patron's shoulders as wool does from a Cotswold sheep that is being shorn in April.

"How did you barbers ever come to have that red and white striped pole outside there as your symbol?" asked the patron.

The barber laid down his clippers, took up his shears, began putting on the finishing touches and said that that was a long story, but that he would tell the patron. And so he did—on the installment plan.

He said that way back in 1461 the surgeons and the barbers were incorporated in one profession, the barbers being confined to blood-letting, drawing teeth, and shaving; and the surgeons, to the more important operations. They had for their symbol the striped pole we have today. The white stripes represented the ribbon for bandaging the arm in bleeding and the basin to catch the blood. Then, in 1745, the barbers and the surgeons separated and the barbers got the symbol, the surgeons getting the "shingle."

"Have a shave?" asked the barber as he completed his work on the hair.

"Yes, but not too close." Then, after a pause, "But say, would you rather work here in a college town than in Kansas City or St. Louis?"

"Yes, I believe I would," said the barber.

He went on to say that he was waiting for September to roll around when the jolly students would return. They were good customers, but demanded good work, probably because they had been used to it at home. They have more work done than the summer students here, in spite of the fewer hair-cuts and shaves in winter. It is interesting to know that the barber's business is affected by rain and sunshine as well as the merchant's business. Wednesday and Saturday nights, and daily from 4 to 8 p. m., are his busiest times.

"Have your hair washed out?"

"No, I believe not."

"Any hair tonic?"

"No, comb it dry. I am in a hurry today."

"Shine, boss?"

"Nop; not today."

The barber combed the patron's hair, wiped the excess powder from his eyes and face and said "NEXT."

The porter got busy with his whisk broom and, after helping the patron on with his coat, followed him to the door brushing his coat-tails to the time of "Yankee Doodle."

Dwindling Business for Jitneys.

PASADENA, Cal., August 7.—In Southern California, where the jitney bus first sprouted, seems likely to be the scene of its first withering, if it ever does get into the sere and yellow stage. B. D. Home, one of Pasadena's pioneer bus drivers, has surrendered his license. He says the jitney will soon be only a memory. At one time Home operated an extensive line of busses. But business dwindled until he couldn't make money with one lonely bus.

On Your Breakfast Menu

Government officials call attention to the fact that popped popcorn "is superior to many breakfast foods."

Served as puffed cereals are served with sugar and cream, it is delicious. As popped corn is higher in digestible nutrients than even corn meal, which long has been held a standard for concentrated food quality, it is far and away ahead of even the higher grades of breakfast foods. More so if the popcorn is pure wholesome.
